

INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR CRIMINOLOGY

VACANCY - PROFESSOR OF CRIMINOLOGY - UNIVERSITY OF GREENWICH

The University of Greenwich seeks a Professor of Criminology to lead development of a strong, internationally recognised, research cluster in the field working at the Greenwich Campus of the University, adjacent to the business and legal centres of London.

As part of its new strategy the University seeks to place research activities at the centre of academic activities to become a fully research-informed institution. We have an impressive track record of achievement in teaching in Criminology and Law, with some of the most satisfied students in London. We now seek to complement this by building research capacity to create a vibrant research culture which includes complementary arms in Criminology and Law through the appointment of professors in both areas.

Criminology is a rapidly growing area of research at the University with colleagues working on policing, terrorism, human rights, international security, risk, prisons, comparative criminal justice, and violence between cultures. We seek a leading professor who can add their own capability to the existing team, introduce new ideas and draw together existing research strands to create a strong, coherent, and internationally recognised research presence in the field.

This is a superb opportunity for an academic leader in the field to build their own reputation and that of the University, working closely with external stakeholders in the justice system to develop new methodologies and understandings which are relevant to current UK society with strong support from the University as it further develops its research agenda on the back of rapid growth over the past few years.
